1. Of apparatus: Used in producing electricity by chemical action after the method discovered by Volta; esp. voltaic battery (Battery 10), voltaic pile (Pile sb.[3] 5).

(a) 1813 Sir H. Davy Agric. Chem. (1814) 41 It has been shown by Experiments made by means of the Voltaic battery..that compound bodies in general are capable of being decomposed by Electrical powers. 1850 Grove Corr. Phys. Forces (ed. 2) 81 A voltaic battery, which consists usually of alternations of two metals, and a liquid capable of acting chemically upon one of them,..is incapable of acting. 1879 G. Prescott Sp. Telephone 1 When galvanism was discovered, at the beginning of the present century, and the voltaic battery invented.

(b) 1815 J. Smith Panorama Sci. & Art II. 275 The Voltaic pile, as well as the battery last described, are now but little used. 1839 Noad Electricity iii. 97 To Volta's experiments we are indebted for the first galvanic instrument, namely, the voltaic pile; it was described by him in the Philosophical Transactions of 1800. 1896 Allbutt's Syst. Med. I. 352 After the discovery of the voltaic pile the use of the electrical machine gradually fell into disuse.

(c) 1812 Sir H. Davy Chem. Philos. 54 Without the Voltaic apparatus, there was no possibility of examining the relations of electrical polarities to chemical attractions. 1827 Faraday Chem. Manip. xvii. 460 Voltaic arrangements, consisting of a few large plates rather than many small ones. 1855 Bain Senses & Int. I. ii. § 22 In a voltaic cell, an energy is generated and transmitted along a wire with inconceivable rapidity. 1884 Knight Dict. Sci. (ed. 3) xxviii. 305 Voltaic electricity is of that peculiar kind which is elicited by the force of chemical action. 1890 Nature 4 Sept., The application of voltaic electricity to the welding and fusion of metals.

b. Of a current: Consisting of voltaic electricity.

1834 Mrs. Somerville Connex. Phys. Sci. xxxi. 324 The magnetic and electric fluids,..arising from all possible positions of the conducting wire, and every direction of the voltaic current. 1860 Piesse Lab. Chem. Wonders 180 The effect of a continued voltaic current.

3. Of or pertaining to, connected with, caused by, electricity due to chemical action.

1820 Faraday Exp. Res. (1859) 65 The little bars..evidently produced voltaic action. 1827 — Chem. Manip. xvii. 461 This formed a voltaic combination with the platina and the fluid. 1855 Bain Senses & Int. II. ii. § 23 The voltaic shock is very different, in consequence of the altered character of the discharge. 1879 Cassell's Techn. Educ. IV. 309/1 The invention of voltaic deposition..created a new era for the manufacture of silver-plated wares.

b. Voltaic brass, brass deposited by the action of electricity.

1860 Ure's Dict. Arts (ed. 5) II. 94 Voltaic brass does not appear to have been obtained in a solid distinct form, but has been successfully produced as a coating upon a copper surface.

Hence Volta·ically adv., by means of, in respect of, voltaic electricity; after the manner of a voltaic battery.

1843 Grove Corr. Phys. Forces etc. (1874) 303 Besides employing the usual chemical tests, I analysed it voltaically. 1844 Noad Electricity (ed. 2) 144 When a series of some hundred couples of zinc and copper cylinders are arranged voltaically, and charged with common water, a battery is obtained. 1865 Mansfield Salts 12 One of these, the Chlorine, is said to be voltaically or chemically negative.

PREFACE TO THE LETTER W.

THE words with initial W here treated include 6,087 Main words, 2,845 Special Combinations explained and illustrated under these, 3,766 Obvious Combinations, and 3,820 Subordinate entries; in all 16,518 words. Of the Main words 1,780 are marked † as obsolete, and 42 are marked ‖ as alien or not completely naturalized. The number of illustrative quotations for the whole letter is 94,097.

The following table illustrates the scale of this portion of the work as compared with that of certain other Dictionaries :—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic' with Suppl.	'Century' Dict. with Suppl.	Here.
Total of words recorded in W	1,024	5,212	7,403	16,518
Words illustrated by quotations	882	2,066	2,501	12,951
Number of illustrative quotations	4,147	3,512	7,595	94,097

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson's Dictionary is 3,790.

The letter W is primarily remarkable for containing two long series of words of which the initial letters are one or other of the consonantal digraphs WH and WR. The words beginning with WH cover 102 pages, those with WR 63 pages. Separate articles on the digraphs themselves will be found in the proper alphabetical places, explaining their history, currency, and use. Originally they both represented a combination of two sounds, which were subsequently simplified. Otherwise, with the exception of the combination WL (which did not survive into Modern English), initial W is capable of being immediately followed only by a vowel; of the combinations of W with a vowel, WA yields by far the largest vocabulary.

This letter is conspicuously native. The greater part of the vocabulary goes back to Old English, with a continuous history down to the present day. Water, with its compounds and derivatives, fills 90 columns; well (sb., adj., vb., adv.) another 90; next in copiousness are wash, way, white, will, wind, with, wood, work, write. In wh- the interrogative-relatives what, which, who, why, etc., fill over 80 columns. All these words have cognates in West Germanic or in Common Teutonic; some have wider connexion with Indo-European. Two common words, woman and worship, are compounds peculiar to Old English. There is a large number of early adoptions from Scandinavian, notable among which are wand, want, wassail, weak, whirl and whirlwind, window, wing, wrong. Dutch and Low German contribute waft, wagon, wainscot, walrus, welter, wriggle, wrack (sb.[2]). From Old French come a good many words, chief among which are wage, wait, war, warden, warrant, waste, wreck; some of these have doublets in g (as gage, guardian); all are ultimately of Teutonic origin. From American Indian tongues we get wampum, wapiti, wigwam; from Australian, wallaby, waratah, wombat, wurley. The number of entries of proper names and appellatives derived therefrom is remarkable; they amount to well over a hundred.

Voluntary work on the letter began as far back as 1881. Mrs. L. J. Walkey arranged the original material for Wa and We alphabetically and chronologically during 1881–1884; the same was done for Wh–Wy in 1882 by Mr. H. S. Tabor, who also combined the old and new series of slips for Whe–Wy in 1882–1884. Wa–Wha was handled by the Rev. W. H. Beckett during 1882–1901; Wh–Wy was sub-edited by the Rev. G. B. R. Bousfield in 1891–1894, and W–Wi (with abundant additions of new material) by the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson in 1913–1919.

During the editorial progress of the letter, which began in 1919, outside help has been given in the reading of proofs by the Misses Edith and E. P. Thompson for the greater part of the letter, by Mr. G. R. Carline and the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson for some early portions, by Dr. G. F. S. Friedrichsen for Wh–Worling, and by Dr. G. Ch. van Langenhove and the Rev. J. B. Johnston for Wr. Assistance in the verification of quotations in the British Museum was given by the late Mr. W. W. Jenkinson, by Mr. R. J. Whitwell, and (latterly) by Mr. F. S. Sieveking. Mr. Whitwell, as heretofore for many years, has made generous contributions to the historical evidence for many articles. Expert outside assistance on special points has been given by Mr. R. Ashton, librarian at Blackburn, Mr. St. Clair Baddeley, Professor Paul Barbier of Leeds, the late Mr. A. F. Bettinson of the National Sporting Club, Mr. E. C. Early of Witney, the Editor of the Field, Professors Fiedler, Neville Forbes, and G. S. Gordon of Oxford, Mr. F. W. Geary, secretary of the Thames Conservancy, Dr. Alfred Götze of Giessen, the Rev. Dr. Claude Jenkins, Lt.-Col. J. H. Leslie, Mr. John Lister of Shibden Hall, Halifax,

Mr. R. G. Marsden, Mr. Hugh Marwick, Orkney, Monsieur A. Meillet, the Provost of Oriel, Sir Frederick Pollock, Col. E. H. Richardson, the late Mr. W. H. Stevenson, Monsieur Antoine Thomas, Dr. E. J. Thomas of the University Library at Cambridge, and Mr. F. H. Wedgwood. To these grateful acknowledgement of obligation is due, as well as to Bodley's Librarian and his assistants, whose ready and generous help has greatly facilitated the extensive researches imposed upon the Dictionary staff.

The editorial staff regularly engaged on the letter W consisted of three sections: four members associated with Dr. Bradley until his death, viz. Mr. Walter Worrall (who specially prepared portions of We and Wo), Mr. W. J. Lewis, Mr. H. J. Bayliss, and Miss E. S. Bradley; three belonging to Dr. Craigie's staff (engaged mainly on Wr), viz. Mr. G. Watson, Mrs. L. F. Powell, and Miss Rosfrith A. N. R. Murray; and three belonging to Mr. Onions's staff, viz. Mr. A. T. Maling, M.A., Mr. F. J. Sweatman, M.A., and Mr. J. W. Birt. To them the editors make cordial acknowledgements for their zealous and painstaking collaboration in a task which, in the demands that it makes for consistency and accuracy in principle and in detail, is hardly equalled and not surpassed in any field of research.

The history of the preparation of this letter is marked by two outstanding events, the death of Dr. Henry Bradley, the then senior editor, on 23 May, 1923, and the appointment in 1925 of Dr. Craigie to a professorship in the Department of English of the University of Chicago, which did not, however, withdraw him from taking part in what then remained to be done to complete the work. These events, together with the allocation (since 1921) of some part of Mr. Onions's time to collateral works, have been contributing factors to a delay which has, however, in the sequel, the happy result that the publication of the concluding pages of the work falls in the year of the fiftieth anniversary of its first association with the name of James A. H. Murray as editor under the auspices of the Delegates of the Clarendon Press.

PREFATORY NOTES.

W—WASH. This double section includes 983 Main words, 368 Special Combinations explained under these, and 692 Subordinate entries; in all 2043. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated number 516, making a total of 2559. Of the Main words 299 (30½%) are marked † as obsolete, and 15 (1½%) are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic', and Suppl.	'Century' Dict., and Suppl.	Here.
Words recorded, W–Wash	169	734	1074	2559
Words illustrated by quotations	129	400	383	1900
Number of illustrative quotations	633	553	1155	14787

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 652.

The W portion of the English vocabulary is remarkable for the entire absence of Greek and Latin derivatives, which under every other letter except Y form a large proportion of the whole. It consists mainly of words belonging to the oldest strata of the language—words inherited from Old English, and early adoptions from Scandinavian and Old French. As most of these words of long history have developed a great variety of senses and forms, the average length of the articles in this part of the Dictionary is greater than usual.

In the present instalment the words of Old English origin include wade, wadset, wain, waist, wake sb.[1] and vb., waken, wale, walk, wall, wallow, wallwort, walnut, wan, wander, wane, wanhope, wanton, ward, ware, warlock, warm, warmth, warn, warp, wart, wary, wash. Of Scandinavian origin are wadmal, wail, wake sb.[2], wall-eye, wall-knot (?), wand, wandreth, want, wapentake. The words from Old French are not much less numerous than the native words; most of them are still in everyday use, as wafer, wage, wager, waif, wait, waive, wallop, war, warble, warden, warder, wardrobe, warrant, warranty, warren, warrior; a few are obsolete, as wardecorps, warish, warison. These words come from the north-eastern dialect of Old French, and are ultimately of Teutonic origin. The initial w preserved in north-eastern Old French is represented in the other Old French dialects and in modern standard French by g(u); hence in modern French and Old French dictionaries the words above quoted are found as gaufre, gage, gageure, † gaif, guetter, † gaiver, galopper, guerre, etc.; and some of them have come into English in two forms, one with w and the other with gu or g: thus we have wage and gage, wallop and gallop, warden and guardian, warranty and guaranty, warish and guarish, warison and garrison. The other etymological sources are very sparingly represented. From Dutch and Low German we have waffle, waft, wagenboom, wagon, wainscot, walrus; from modern High German wacke, waldflute, waldgrave, waldhorn, waltz. The languages of India have contributed only wallah and wanderoo. From Arabic there are wadi, Wahabi, wali. There are a few words belonging to the aboriginal languages of Australia—waddy, wallaby, wallaroo, waratah, warrigal; but these, though familiar English in colonial use, are otherwise little known. Of the American Indian words, wampum (wampumpeag) and wapiti are perhaps generally known; the others, wahoo, wakon, wallaba, wangun, wankapin, wapacut, warracoori, warree, occur only in works treating of natural history or anthropology. One Chinese word appears, wampee, and one Japanese, wacadash, represented by a few quotations of the beginning of the 17th century.

Among the words presenting interesting sense-development may be mentioned waft vb.[1], wait sb. and vb.[1], walk sb. and vb., wallop, wan, wane, waniand (wanion), wanton, ward, warlock, warm, warp sb. and vb., warrant, wash sb. and vb. Etymological facts or suggestions not given in other dictionaries will be found under waft vb.[1], wafter, wait vb.[2], wallwort, walnut, walrus, wampum, war, warble, warder sb.[2], warrior. Attention may be called to the articles on the prefix wan- and the suffixes -ward, -wards, the origin and functions of which are treated with a fullness not hitherto attempted.

WASH—WAVY. This section includes 488 Main words, 468 Special Combinations explained under these, and 149 Subordinate entries; in all 1105. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated number 459, making a total of 1564. Of the Main words 75 (15%) are marked † as obsolete, and only 2 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures :—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic.' and Suppl.	'Century' Dict. and Suppl.	Here.
Words recorded, Watch to Wavy	68	628	982	1564
Words illustrated by quotations	54	182	262	1415
Number of illustrative quotations	293	282	615	7535

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 236.

Thirty of the sixty-four pages of this section are occupied with the word water and its compounds; and about the same number by wash, waste, watch and wave, with their connexions. In consequence, the number of primary words included is extremely small. Nearly all of them are of native English origin; wassail and wath are from Old Norse; waste (sb., adj., vb.), wastel, wastine, watchet, are from Old French. Of words from non-European languages there are only wat[4] (Siamese), and watap and wavey (American Indian). The proper names Waterloo, Watling-street, Watteau are included on account of their attributive or appellative uses; scientific terms derived from proper names are watt and wavellite.

With regard to etymology, new information or conclusions differing from those accepted in previous dictionaries will be found in the articles wassail sb., waste adj., watchet; new suggestions are also offered as to the origin of wattle sb.[1] and sb.[2], which have hitherto been regarded as etymologically identical. Examples of remarkable sense-development will be found under waste sb., adj., vb., watch sb. and vb., wave sb. and vb. The sb. water, like its synonyms in other European languages, has developed a multitude of strikingly divergent metaphorical uses; and many of its compounds and derivatives, having been formed at an early period, have an interesting sense-history of their own.

WAVY—WEZZON. In this section of the Dictionary there are 1481 Main words, 456 Special Combinations explained under these, 416 Obvious Combinations, and 850 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms: in all 3203. Of the Main words 367 are marked † as obsolete, and 10 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some other dictionaries gives the following figures :—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic' and Suppl.	'Century' Dict. and Suppl.	Here.
Words recorded	177	879	1218	3203
Words illustrated by quotations	154	380	406	2406
Number of quotations	750	600	1149	17707

In the corresponding portion of Richardson the quotations number 676.

In this instalment of W the vocabulary, with very few exceptions, is of native origin; the great majority of the fundamental words go back to Old English, have a continuous history down to the present day, and have given rise to many derivative and compound forms. Among the important nouns so represented are wax, way (extending to 27 columns), weal, weald (with an interesting history), wealth, weapon, weasand, weasel, weather, web, wed (a pledge), wedding, wedge, wedlock, Wednesday, weed (plant), weed (garment), week, weel (pool), weel (basket), weevil, weft, weight, weir, weird, welcome, welfare, welkin, well, wen, wench (earlier wenchel), west, wet (earlier wete), wether, and wey. Compounds with wax-, way-, weather-, or well- as the first element are also numerous. Weld (the dye) and welt (of a shoe, etc.) are probably native, though not recorded in OE. Adjectives of early origin, as waxen, †wealy, weary, Welsh, are rare; of later date are waxy, wayward, wealthy, weighty, weird (an interesting development from the noun), well (from the adverb), and wet (by substitution for the earlier wete). The older verbs include wax (to grow), wean, wear, weave, wed, weed, ween, weep, weet (to know), weigh, well, wend, were (to defend), wet (earlier wete). Of other parts of speech the most notable are the pronoun we and the adverbs well and west. Well has not only developed a very large number of special or contextual senses, requiring twelve columns of illustration, but has supplied a noun and adjective, and has been so extensively employed as the first element in compounds (many of which are of long standing in the language) that these extend to over 50 columns, and are in reality almost inexhaustible.

Many of the above words present features of special interest, and attention may also be directed to the articles on way-bit, way-leet, way-wiser, wayzgoose, wean (= child), wedenonfa', Wedgwood, wee adj., weeping cross, wellaway, Welsh rabbit, werewolf, and wergeld.

The other Germanic tongues are very scantily represented; Scandinavian has supplied the adj. weak (on which weaken, weakly, etc., have been formed), wappen as a northern dialect variant of weapon, and the verb welt (to roll), while the related welter is from Dutch or Low German. From Old French come the obsolete wayment, waynpain, and wayour. Gaelic has furnished weem, Magyar Waywode as a variant of Vai-, Voivode, and Arabic wazir, a more original form of Vizier. Of imitative origin are waw sb.[3] and v.[2], weet v.[2], weet-weet, and wehee.

The articles in this section as far as weigh were revised and sent to the printer by Dr. Bradley; the remainder, after the usual preparation by his staff, have been edited by Dr. Craigie with the co-operation of Mr. Worrall.

In the ETYMOLOGY,

OE. e, o, representing an earlier a, are distinguished as ę, ǫ (having the phonetic value of ę and ǫ, or ọ, above); as in ęnde from andi (OHG. anti, Goth. andei-s), mǫnn from mann, ǫn from an.

W.

W (dʌ·b'l,yū), the 23rd letter of the modern English alphabet, is an addition to the ancient Roman alphabet, having originated from a ligatured doubling of the Roman letter represented by the U and V of modern alphabets. When, in the 7th c., the Latin alphabet was first applied to the writing of English, it became necessary to provide a symbol for the sound (w), which did not exist in contemporary Latin. This sound, a gutturally-modified bilabial voiced spirant, is acoustically almost identical with the devocalized (u̯) or (u), which was the sound originally expressed by the Roman U or V as a consonant-symbol; but before the 7th c. this Latin sound had developed into (v). The single u or v therefore could not without ambiguity be used to represent (w), though this was occasionally done, and in some Northumbrian texts was the regular practice. The ordinary sign for (w) was at first uu, but in the 8th c. this began to be superseded by ƿ, a character borrowed from the Runic alphabet, in which its name was wyn (Kentish wen). Eventually the use of ƿ became almost universal, but in the mean time the uu was carried from England to the continent, being used for the sound (w) in the German dialects, and in French proper names and other words of Teut. and Celtic origin. In the 11th c. the ligatured form was introduced into England by Norman scribes, and gradually tonk the place of ƿ, which finally went out of use about A.D. 1300. The character W was probably very early regarded as a single letter, although it has never lost its original name of 'donble U'.

In OE. the sound (w) occurred initially not only before vowels but also before (l) and (r). The combination wl became obsolete in the 15th c. (in Sc. poetry wlonk, alliterating with w- words, was used in the 16th c.); wr is still written, but the w is silent in standard English, though in some dialects it is sounded as (w) or as (v). OE. had also the initial combination (hw), written hu(u, hƿ, and subsequently ƿh, wh; for the later development of this phonetic combination, and the history of the associated symbols, see WH.

The chief etymological sources of the Eng. (w) are: (1) OE. (w), mainly representing Indogermanic w, gh^{w}, kw, or k^{w}; (2) ON. (w) of the same origin (in cited words expressed by v, according to Icelandic usage); (3) OF. (w), retained in northeastern Fr. dialects, but elsewhere becoming (gw) and ultimately (g), whence in English such doublets as wage and gage, warranty and guaranty. The sound also occurs, represented otherwise than by w, in words of Latin origin containing the combinations qu (kw) and su (sw), as question, suavity, persuade (in 16–18th c. often written with sw); also in a few Fr. words, as reservoir (-vwār).

So far as it remains a consonant-symbol, the letter never denotes any other sound than (w), but in a few words it has ceased to be pronounced, though still written, as in answer, sword, two, and in the combination wr referred to above. In the unstressed second element of a compound, (w) tends to be elided in colloquial speech. This contracted pronunciation is in some words a mere vulgarism (marked as such by spellings like back'ard, forrard, allus for always); in Norwich and some other place-names in -wich it is the only one regarded as correct, and the same may be said with regard to the nautical term gunwale; in midwife the contraction (mi·dif), formerly general, is now rarely heard. The tendency to elision of w beginning an unstressed second syllable is shown also in the change of housewife into huzzif, huzzy, where the spelling has followed the pronunciation, though the uncontracted form is now restored exc. in a special disparaging sense.

In some ME. MSS. (northern and north midland), and in many Scottish texts of the 15th and 16th centuries, w is written for v, and vice versa. In the 16th and 17th c., books printed from continental type often have the letter in the divided form VV, vv.
